

Programming to engage men for health and gender equality

Lessons learned from Burnet Institute projects in Myanmar, Papua New Guinea and Zimbabwe

Gender inequality is a fundamental cause of poor health outcomes, particularly for women and children.

Working with men can be a valuable strategy to improve health outcomes, and gender equality outcomes, by challenging unequal gender norms, roles and relations.

Burnet Institute conducted a meta-evaluation to identify lessons learned across five projects that engaged men to address gender-related determinants of health. This portfolio of projects was implemented from 2012 to 2018, and funded by the Australian Government through the Australian NGO Cooperation Program (ANCP).

Findings illustrate some of the challenges and opportunities in implementing projects with a gender-transformative agenda, and highlight recommendations for projects that seek to engage men to achieve sustainable change.

You are invited to attend a learning workshop to review evaluation findings, and reflect on implications for current and future programming. Findings are particularly relevant for programs focused on health and/or gender, as well as related areas such as early child development.
